A suggestion for a journal entry for our next class is to sit in front of a window and write your thoughts with an eye to what is outside — the trees budding, the quiet on the streets, or even just the blue color of the sky. We all have stories to tell and this global time-out can be a good time to write them down.

At WritingFix, we believe that journals are a critical piece in a successful classroom writing workshop. A writers workshop environment, as you probably know, gives students the freedom to write about what's personally important to them. A journal is a place where students can explore those ideas that feel important in a non-threatening way.
